Less than one per cent of pain patients who have been prescribed potentially addictive opioid drugs are successfully weaned off them, according to a new study in the journal Pain Management Nursing. Dr Marise McDermott from the Department of Anaesthesia, Pain and Perioperative Medicine and the Australian Centre for Clinical Care of Pain (ACCCP) at The Alfred Hospital, Melbourne, and colleagues analyzed whether opioid detoxification treatment clinics were able to significantly reduce long-term opioid use or resulted in a meaningful change for patients. This study is the first of its kind in Australia and the first to use electronic medical records across a large number of clinics to retrospectively analyze patients who have been prescribed opioids and then have their prescriptions reviewed by a specialist medical service to determine their suitability for opioid detoxification. As part of this study, the researchers identified 8,960 patients who started a course of opioid detoxification within the ACCCP, of whom 1,107 were reviewed by the opioid detoxification services. The researchers found less than one per cent of patients whose prescriptions were reviewed by the opioid detoxification program for review were weaned off the opioid drug successfully. This finding is consistent with the results of previous studies. Dr McDermott said the evidence suggests that opioid detoxification does not work as most studies of opioid detoxification or management programs have been conducted. "Acute management of acute pain is the responsibility of doctors, but follow-up care is the responsibility of a specialist medical service," Dr McDermott said. "We need to ensure that patients are weaned off their opioid prescription appropriately and effectively. "There has been a trend to rely on long-term prescriptions, which can have significant risks, and to increase prescribing of non-opioid medications. "The evidence is weak and clear guidelines need to be developed to ensure the safest possible care." The study was published in Pain Management Nursing.
