Research on immunoregulation in the rhesus monkey has progressed apace in recent years and has expanded from in vivo to in vitro investigations. These studies have established that some of the mechanisms that control the immunologic unresponsiveness of the fetus in the pregnant monkey may serve as a guide for understanding the processes that preserve "tolerance" in the offspring. In particular, the composition and rate of cell influx into the lymphoid tissues are the major differences between these two phenomena. The latter appear to relate to the age of the fetus and to the mode of delivery, and these features are similar to those in the human fetus. In addition to the generally accepted role of the thymus in regulating cell trafficking, the macrophages may also have a significant role in limiting the number of lymphocytes entering the thymus. Despite the apparent differences
