Sensor networks are used for a wide range of applications, such as object tracking, target localization, and target movement estimation. For instance, one application of sensor networks is the tracking of humans in a space so that the path of the human can be found. One drawback with currently known methods of target tracking is the requirement of a known starting point for the target. For instance, in a process of human tracking, it is difficult to accurately track the path of a human if the human is moving around, as the human is essentially a point-like target. However, if the human is moving about in an enclosed space with a known starting point, such as the room that the human is located in, the human can be tracked from that starting point. Typically, sensors on the network are fixedly placed in an environment to be monitored. The sensors must then be assigned a location, such as the wall of the room or a person within the room. However, given the dense placement of the sensors, oftentimes the sensors may be incapable of being assigned a unique location. For instance, current sensors may be incapable of generating an absolute location for its vicinity. Current sensors may only be capable of generating relative location information and the process of establishing an absolute location for a sensor is very inefficient. is the lone survivor of a Russian-ordered mission to assassinate a Hamas leader. But this week he discovered the secret of the place he is held captive in. When he steals a cellphone from the guard, he quickly discovers that the assassination order he lives by was intercepted by his mobile phone carrier, giving the Israeli army the ability to track and pinpoint him. The United States is seizing on a wave of financial crises from Greece to Argentina and
