Changes in phenotypes and mycotoxin production by Fusarium oxysporum f. sp. ciceris (Foc) during the pea-pathogenic phase in chickpea. Pathogenicity of Fusarium oxysporum f. sp. ciceris (Foc) to chickpea was investigated during the pea-pathogenic phase, i.e. after emergence of pea seedlings. Three isolates of F. oxysporum f. sp. ciceris were tested. Mycelial growth, PDA formation, maximum growth temperature and yield of fusaric acid in chickpea were determined. Inoculation of Foc conidial suspensions into the soil at different days after pea emergence resulted in variable fungal survival but did not affect yield of fusaric acid in chickpea. Pea-pathogenic phase in chickpea could be divided into 3 phases, as revealed by mycelial growth, maximum growth temperature and yield of fusaric acid. First phase started as early as 1 to 3 days after pea emergence and maximum fusaric acid was produced in first 2 weeks. During second phase production of fusaric acid was maximum in first 2 months. Third phase started in the second half of the first growing season. Mycelial growth, maximum growth temperature and yield of fusaric acid were maximum during the second phase.

Theoretical study on Ni-based spin crossover system: how a ferromagnetic transition is replaced by a spin crossover through inclusion of unoccupied states. Fluctuations of electronic states at metal-substrate interface could give a novel enhancement on the relative position of magnetic ground state of adsorbed Ni-based system. By combining cluster model and density functional theory, we observed that the doping of unoccupied states at the interface could significantly reduce the energy of the Ni-based spin crossover system. Magnetic moments of Ni and the compounds at the interface are also estimated in the investigation. This is expected to provide a pathway in tuning and controlling the spin crossover properties of the adsorbed compound.Q: ¿Cómo

Elden ring Crack Drinking habits of dental hygienists. To describe the drinking habits of dental hygienists, 323 dental hygienists were surveyed by mailing a questionnaire about their average daily intake of alcohol, frequency of drinking episodes, and quantities of alcohol they drink when involved in occupation activities. One hundred twenty-six (39%) of the dental hygienists answered the questionnaire. Most of the hygienists drank alcohol about once a week. Hygienists older than 45 years of age drank alcohol significantly more often than younger hygienists (p less than 0.001). The mean daily alcohol intake was 20.3 g (SD = 12.7), though 73% of the women consumed alcohol only at meals and did not drink any alcoholic beverages during the other working hours. Most hygienists reported a positive response to the question "Does your drink inhibit your job performance, even if you do have other alcoholic beverages at lunchtime?" (97%) with the percentages of "yes" being similar for the men and women. The majority (79%) reported drinking at least a few drinks per occasion, and the number did not vary significantly according to age.!
