xforce. Remyelination and axon regeneration in a nerve crush injury model. Previous studies have suggested that Schwann cells (SCs) are the major glial cells responsible for repair and regeneration in the central nervous system. We compared the effects of peripheral nerve crush injury on the differentiation and myelination of SCs to those of astrocytes and oligodendrocytes. In the perinerve regions of adult murine sciatic nerve, we performed unilateral sciatic nerve crush injury. Peripheral nerve crush injury induced the progressive regeneration of myelinated axons and expression of myelin-related genes in injured axons at 4 days and of myelin proteins in injured axons at 12 days after the crush. The peak of myelination was at 3 weeks after injury. The perinerve regions were immunopositive for the O1 and MBP antigens from 2 weeks after the crush.

Immunohistochemistry showed that Ki-67-positive proliferating cells and O1-positive SCs were present in the epineurium and perineurium, and that both were present in the central area of the crushed nerve. Double-labeling demonstrated that SCs and proliferating cells coexisted in the perineurium and central area of the crushed nerve. In contrast, in the crushed nerve, most GFAP-positive astrocytes failed to elongate processes after injury. This study demonstrates that peripheral nerve crush injury induces not only the myelination but also the proliferation of SCs in the injured nerve. Our results imply that peripheral nerve crush injury is an appropriate experimental model to study the differentiation and myelination of SCs and their progenitor cells.
