Tip When printing to a color laser or color inkjet printer, Photoshop prints in the default 8-bit color mode with a maximum of three colors for photos or six colors for art graphics. When you wish to print in truecolor, your printer must support that feature. If you haven't previously set the print job color profile to truecolor, it probably defaults to 8-bit color. Most inkjet printers will happily print in truecolor, and the setting is easy to change (see the box on Getting the Most out of Color Printing). * Layer modes : Layer modes are like the layer overlays discussed in the section "Layer overlays: Things to Know First" later in this chapter. Figure 6-6, left, shows the Layers palette. Layer modes enable you to apply complex alterations to an image. Layer modes come in many types (each type refers to a specific process or combination of processes that affects the layer mode in a unique way). A few are relatively easy to understand and use, but a better picture of these types of modes comes after you take a look at the types. Figure 6-6. Left: The Layers palette enables you to quickly open a document and add and arrange layers. Many of the Layer types, shown in Figure 6-6, right, are more sophisticated. Red arrows indicate active layers. The current layer is at the bottom of the layers and its contents are displayed at the top of the Layers palette. You can see the onscreen graphic of the current layer's image within the layered elements of any other layer. The best way to work with this mode is to convert the layers to the visibility/hiding, and layer-based versions of the layered mode. This is the procedure for Layers, Masks, and Smart Filters in the following sections. The layers of this image are opaque except for the background; layers are a big part of the magic of Photoshop. At any time, you can have up to 32 layers open in a document (more if you use Smart Objects, which we discuss in the next section). Even if there are only two layers on a page, you have access to

For the tens of thousands of people who now rely on a home loan, the value of their homes have been on their minds. But for the tiny number of borrowers who take out a 100% loan, these values are not so important. And still, neither of those markets are fixed – the size of these markets is constantly changing as more borrowers take out 100% loans and pay down their loan faster. The fall in overall home prices has also been a double-edged sword for real estate agents, with their share of the home market turning negative over the last year as more potential buyers take out high percentage loans.
