Mechanisms of oxidative damage to DNA. While oxidative DNA damage is commonplace, it is usually only DNA lesions that have been identified that are mutagenic and carcinogenic. The consequences of DNA oxidation are likely to be less direct: oxidation of DNA may increase DNA mutation rate and/or damage may be removed through BER, MMR, etc. Oxidatively damaged bases are mutagenic and probably mutate at a lower rate than normal bases by direct mispairing. Oxidatively damaged bases also tend to destabilize adenine:thymine and guanine:cytosine pairs, resulting in alterations of DNA secondary structure. Some combinations of oxidatively damaged bases also cause direct strand breaks. Oxidative damage to DNA may be the result of increased oxidant production, decreased cellular antioxidant activity, and oxidative damage to DNA-active molecules. The latter are likely to include lipids, proteins and lipoproteins, and nucleic acids. The nucleic acid damage induced by oxidizing agents reflects the structure of DNA and the identity of the bases. Oxidative DNA damage may also increase with age, and may also be aggravated by genetic polymorphisms. There is an urgent need to evaluate the
