In an interview with a Russian newspaper on Monday, the head of the Foreign Intelligence Service, Sergey N. Lavrov, said that the United States was "invoking NATO's doctrine of the use of military force, including military action outside the UN Security Council, as an instrument of foreign policy without any legal basis, even if that doctrine is not limited to an act of aggression." Mr. Lavrov said that "Russia, together with China, will demand that the United States return to the boundaries of the UN charter" and that "if it does not do so, Russia will take into account that." Mr. Lavrov also said that Russia will "draw attention" to the "uncontrolled and ungrounded" military activities of the United States and its allies in the world, including "in the region of the Middle East and North Africa." Although most Russian officials have expressed support for President Bashar al-Assad of Syria, both Mr. Lavrov and President Dmitry V. Medvedev, Mr. Lavrov's boss, have taken an unusually public stance in support of Mr. Assad's opponents. In his first major interview since the crisis in Syria began in March 2011, Mr. Lavrov did not directly address whether Moscow should support the rebels seeking to overthrow Mr. Assad. Instead, he implied that Russia would rather see the country remain a unitary state. "Russia, along with the other permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, favors the continuation of the state as a unitary one," he said. "But that's for the Syrians to decide." However, Mr. Lavrov said he had asked the Russian president, Mr. Medvedev, to think about what he called "the global security of the country." "One of the main factors for the Russian side is that the world's most powerful
