building a tree in the scene in nuke is easy. the tree is built by the tree nodes. a node can be connected with other nodes, and you can use the “branches”, “leaves”, and “leaf append node” to connect the tree. sometimes in nuke, you may need to use the “+” button or right click to build a new node. this is not only simple, but also convenient and easy to use.

designed for a wide range of projects, from desktop animation to film and games; integrated into all major nuke-compatible external compositing, editorial and traditional tools. whether to provide high-end vegetation with an exquisite look or simple place to get a few trees, speedtree can meet nearly all your needs. the easy-to-use interface gives users an easy to use workflow and the creativity to quickly and easily explore unlimited possibilities. the maximum tree density is five levels. tree growth begins with a bare area, which is then filled with leaves and branches. leaves increase in size and number until a leaf with enough force to support its own weight falls. the fall of a leaf does not immediately change the state of the tree. when the wind is strong or there is a strong fall, the tree loses leaves. the wind stops and leaves start to form. the entire growth process takes approximately one hour. at normal temperature and moisture, trees do not grow and the leaves stay where they fall. when the air temperature is low, or water is in shortage, however, trees become unproductive and leaves drop spontaneously. a tree has a set of cycles called dynamic cycles. the dynamic cycles simulate the behavior of real trees and are based on the results of atmospheric and water simulation models. the internal cycles of wind can affect a tree, as well as rain and sunshine conditions, temperature, and time of the day. trees also have dynamic collision and destruction behaviors. trees collapse when the wind speeds up dramatically or when they are subjected to massive rain, or in the case that the tree size is about to exceed its own maximum limit. leaves can be easily added and removed. if the tree is rotated, the new leaf positions and sizes should be consistent to maintain the tree's weight balance. use speedtree composer and animate/infuse to exchange live footage with the auto-generated trees. 5ec8ef588b
